

Azov Sea Flashpoint: Russia, Ukraine Teetering on the Brink of War

by Peter Korzun via james - Strategic Culture Monday, Sep 17 2018, 1:01am international / prose / post

Prior to reading this article readers should consider the broader picture/strategy of the US to contain both Russia and China using proxy forces and vassal states to do their dirty work. Readers would note that China recently offered military support to Syria should Assad require it to oust the remnants of imported terrorists in Idlib, which include Uighur forces. The USA has been fomenting trouble in China's Muslim Uighur region in order to block a vital transit route of China's BRI, the so-called new Silk Road Initiative, which when completed would clearly make China the number one world economic and trading State. Read the following not as a single unrelated flashpoint but as part of an overall strategy by the USA to contain major competitors. Indeed, the unipolar American world is coming to an end and America may deploy every dirty trick in the book, but it's a LOST cause as progress and a wide range of benefits for numerous European and Asian nations cannot be thwarted or stopped.

Ukraine has