

A House Divided Cannot Stand ...

by gus Monday, Nov 12 2018, 2:34am

international / prose / post

The American Right-Wing White Cannot See the Nose On Its Racist Face

If the message of the midterms has taught us anything it's not to be found on surface layers of political discourse.

Steve Bannon, the grubby personification of all that is wrong with America

The racist American 'Reds' are obvious losers in the mid and long term in America. The greatest error of Republican strategists was to highlight racial divisions, and as sure as day follows night, the ever-increasing brown Espanics are overwhelming aged, white supremacists.

Consider the horrid racist politics of Steve Bannon, largely responsible for placing Trump in the oval office, this occurrence, if viewed in perspective, was the last twitch of a dying man on the operating table. Indeed, Trump prevailed though he lost the popular vote, and although he remains trapped in the means by which he came to power, division and hate politics, with his absurd 'walls' and all but concentration camps for brown-skinned Latinos fleeing the US disrupted nations of their birth, those methods are clearly exhausted. The same could be said of the millions of Middle Eastern and North African Arabs now fleeing to Europe as a result of more American interference with their nations of birth, America has never learnt from history! And so it becomes evident that the chickens have come home to roost, political analysts and historians could have told them so.

But what matter, say short term political thinkers, a victory is a victory notwithstanding it may be the very last of very bad political choices.

By focusing on race and division, hoping vainly to harness what is left of the Red white right, Republicans have effectively cut their own throats, why? Simply because by highlighting race and ethnic divisions, ignoring that non-white populations now outweigh remaining white right supporters America wide, brown, black, yellow and various shades between, consciously or unconsciously became race oriented voters (thank you mass media) NOT POLICY VOTERS. Good work Steve, you idiot!

Had Republicans embraced universal, non-divisive politics the midterms and future elections may have been and would be entirely different, a nation MUST embrace all its people as ONE citizenry if it has any hope of future progress and success/relevance. By grasping past, and passed, primitive ideological formulas, which indeed did wonders THEN, antiquated racists have done themselves no favours as they have effectively made all non-whites a unified voting force, minorities united become a huge majority in the USA as the midterm results NOW highlight, but alas, not to white supremacists that learn nothing new.

Take Australia as a good example, in the 50's the population was 95% Anglo white, today they are less than half the population, however, shrewd Aussie politicians realised that by not embracing race and divisive politics they were able to maintain power, particularly the conservatives, which party continues to have among its members antiquated racists and hard-liners in government and influential offices, however, the clear majority of politicians have accepted the REALITY that if they intend to succeed they must embrace the DIVERSITY of today's Australia, a lesson clearly not learned in the USA, which nation continues to live in some past dreamworld in every cultural sense.

The ridiculous slogan 'Make America Great AGAIN' was/is a LIE, as at no stage was America Great like previous empires, Russia, France, Great Britain, Spain etc. America is an adolescent nation and as such is witnessed by the WORLD doing all the wrong things and making all the wrong choices, but such are the follies of adolescence and youth. Though again, understanding history could have saved America.

So, all you doodle dreamboats, either embrace a universal politics for ALL, or die the ignominious death you deserve, and that applies to racist nationalists world-wide.

The nationalist twitch seen in numerous nations today, is merely that, a death twitch on a body that took too long to die.

Inverse Times Open Publishing. <http://inversetimes.lingama.net/news/story-340.html>