The US is panicking at the moment because China is playing such a strong, CONSTRUCTIVE and influential role in Afghanistan; America's answer to China's increasing influence is of course entirely predictable, more U.S. occupation troops, as if bullet and bomb diplomacy works -- when will rustic America ever learn?

Since America engineered and launched its open-ended war on 'terror,' ravaging and plundering numerous nations and murdering millions of innocents in the process, American popularity and its international status/reputation have suffered enormously, but has Washington woken up? Not a chance, General (retired) Wesley Clark summed it up perfectly, "if you only have a hammer then every problem becomes a nail."

Illegal invasions, bombs and war are not the solution, they are the problem though the thick-heads in Washington and the nefarious US corporations that profit enormously from war will have none of it. The US is stuck between a rock and a hard place today or should I say between avarice and hubris. No matter, as other more constructive superpowers are filling the void left behind by the US, thank you lunatic neocons, which have now proven to be the most destructive and harmful influence America has ever experienced.

Consequently the WORLD looks to other progressive, peaceful nations for constructive solutions. Now think of all the blood, guts and mayhem the US is directly responsible for over the past two decades and its result, it's not rocket science to determine WHY the US, with its single war foreign policy, is going backwards at speed.

Regardless of the perspective you take on America's future, it's grim, economically, socially (division) and internationally, pariah status or ostracism.

Children are aware that aggressive bullies are despised by all, you would think that with all the hugely funded US think-tanks one would have been able to state the obvious to the powers that be, notwithstanding they are not paid to tell the truth only what their benefactors wish to hear. Indeed, America is caught in its own destructive spiral from which there is no clear escape, its fate is sealed and there is no escaping the inevitable.
