

The Political Rule of a Dunce -- how the WORLD Should React

by gary Friday, Jun 8 2018, 3:22am

international / prose / post

To say that Trump is politically incompetent is gross understatement, the guy is a political dunce, yet he leads one of the most powerful nations on earth and that is the dilemma for the world, how to deal with Trump's America?

Ignoramus Extraordinaire

A bereft Trump leads the only way he knows how, with confusion, contradictions and chaos. There is no need to try and analyse a political idiot and severely flawed personality, the world must deal with it one way or the other and the other seems the appropriate choice, as attempting to deal with an unstable, flawed to the extreme personality is a monumental waste of time.

The effects of idiotic leadership are real and stunning, America under Trump has drastically declined in standing and reputation to the extent that even its vassal states across the globe are reconsidering their relationship with Washington; that notwithstanding, America's enemies which are playing this dunce for all its worth, are having a field day.

Chaotic leadership means a chaotic society with no stable ground upon which to rest and build. While the world gloats over America's misfortune it shouldn't be forgotten that all American presidents are puppets of the ruling elite or deep state, and if these entities did not want Trump to lead, clearly he wouldn't be president and I do not exclude assassination if all else fails. So Trump continues with the support of the ruling establishment, so why would they tolerate such an incompetent buffoon? Answer, clearly, Trump is useful to the real powers that be.

Trump's confusing actions and lack of expertise distract from the real rulership and its agenda for world hegemony, nevertheless, Trump now realises who is boss and does everything expected of him regarding policy, like any captured puppet/servant would. The powers keep the pressure on with Russiagate and all manner of other created threats against their unstable puppet, just in case. However, there is no doubt that core US policy has not changed, in fact it has intensified. So how should the world deal with the threat of US hegemony?

Simple, as all great solutions are. Very few intelligent people suffer fools and Trump is the king of fools. Fools are routinely ignored, removed and ostracised if physical removal is problematic, which is the case with Trump. Tolerating Trump while pandering to his infantile ego has proven effective for Kim Jong Un, while he plays REAL politics with other nations behind the scenes and establishes REAL relationships to further his and other nations' interests. The world has seen this type of behaviour from various world leaders frequently lately. But the negative consequences, which are a huge dis-connect in real world affairs for America, should greatly concern Washington, as the world by the day is charting its own course without Washington's approval or disapproval, in other words, you deal with the buffoon yourself, America.

Ruling elites are slow to react but do so when the problem becomes unavoidable, however, it seems from the POV of America's ruling establishment that Trump is still useful, though I and many others would disagree, nevertheless, even the insular American elite would wake up when their status, influence and financial standing is impacted severely, which indications of such, are now strong.

So, the longer the world plays Trump and gets on with business the better for them and the worse for the USA. It appears that the American dream(world) is not a myth, it is an enduring reality for America, much to the cost of the dreamers.

---

Inverse Times Open Publishing. <http://inversetimes.lingama.net/news/story-44.html>